Early Life and Career

Marc Hunter was born in Melbourne, Australia, on January 1, 1954. He began playing guitar and singing at an early age, and he formed his first band, The Strangers, while still in high school. In 1973, Hunter joined the band Dragon, which was then known as Kahvas Jute. Dragon quickly became one of the most popular bands in Australia, and their debut album, "Universal Radio," was a huge success. Hunter's powerful vocals and charismatic stage presence were a major part of the band's success, and he quickly became one of the most popular singers in Australia.

Dragon continued to release successful albums throughout the 1970s and 1980s, and they became one of Australia's most successful bands. Hunter wrote some of the band's biggest hits, including "April Sun in Cuba," "Still in Love with You," and "Get That Jive." Hunter also had a successful solo career, and he released several solo albums, including "Marc Hunter" (1979) and "Flame" (1984).

Later Years and Death

Hunter's career began to decline in the late 1980s, and he struggled with drug and alcohol addiction. He was diagnosed with diabetes in 1993, and his health continued to decline in the following years. In 1998, Hunter suffered a heart attack and died at the age of 44.

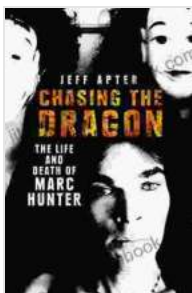

Hunter's death was a major loss for the Australian music community. He was one of the most talented and charismatic singers in Australian history, and his songs continue to be enjoyed by fans all over the world.
